Q: How do I connect to a PostgreSQL server that has Kerberos authentication (FTP, IMAP, SSH, etc) using the `java.net.Authenticator` class? I'm building a Java desktop application that needs to connect to a PostgreSQL server. It's important that any services that the desktop application provides (like IMAP, FTP, SSH) must use the server. How can I authenticate against a PostgreSQL server that requires Kerberos authentication? I've read the Java docs at: and I think I've got the concepts, but I don't understand the code. I have a password file that looks like this: `krb4://dummy/dummy` And I have a file called `client.conf` on my desktop that looks like this: `[domain_realm] mydomain.com = dummy [principal] krb4_client=unix_user:dummy@mydomain.com [realms] dummy = mydomain.com [admin_account] krb4_client=unix_user:dummy@mydomain.com [basic_consumers] # Basic consumers client1 = mydomain.com [public] krb4_client=public@mydomain.com [machine_consumers] # Machine-wide consumers client2 = mydomain.com [cache_servers] krb4_client=localhost [kdc] krb5_client=localhost krb5_store=localhost krb5_kdc=localhost krb5_conf=krb5.conf` I know that I have to provide a server name in the `newInstance()` method like this: `String serverName = "..."; // the host name of the database server // set server name isProxy = true; serverName = new String(serverName.getBytes("ISO-8859-1"), "UTF-8"); // create a SOCKS proxy to the backend Authenticator a = new Authenticator() { public PasswordAuthentication getPasswordAuthentication() {`

Speed Of Light & Vibration I just read a book called and it was very good. Then I read a response to a reviewer that said the book was interesting but it was "not completely free of gaps." Well of course it's not completely free of gaps, we're human and therefore, we err. I just hope the author didn't take a Ritalin to be able to write that. Anyway, the holes, apparently, were related to ideas about heat and the speed of light. I don't know what he was thinking. I thought this was interesting for all the usual reasons. According to the book, this is what happens when electrons are accelerated. An electron is moving toward an atom (or is an atom that's about to be accelerated). So the electron is moving toward something massive and is exerting a force on it. According to the book the force of the electron exerting its force is spread out in all directions around it. If I understand this correctly, the force of the electron should be spread outward in all directions at the speed of light. Now the thing that seems "not completely free of gaps" is that the force of the electron is not spread out at the speed of light. According to the book, that would mean that a photon would be traveling outward at the speed of light, but would be taking an infinitely long time to reach the electron, because the electron moves with the speed of light. This sounds to me like we've proven Einstein wrong, or at least proven there's something wrong with the textbook proof. You're thinking of the kinetic energy of the electron. Of course, the electron's velocity is equal to its momentum. You could do an experiment in which you accelerate an electron to see if it reaches relativistic speeds. If it does, you'll have to revise your picture of what determines the speed of light. I just read a book called and it was very good.
