My question is, .Q: Android AsyncTask: finish() ends the task with null. How to end the task even if there is no data for the current activity? I'm working on an Android app using the AsyncTask method provided by Android SDK. I'm using a progressDialog to show some information as soon as the task started and the doInBackground method returns a value, all the user needs to do is update the progressBar. So, my idea was to use the finish() method in order to end the task even if there is no value for the current activity. After updating the progressBar, I want to "return" from the method using the return() method. This works just fine until I close the application from Android Studio, but then the application crashes with the message: FATAL
