ISP Ping displays to the left a list of current pinging servers. WebPing displays the pinging status and response time on the right. Simple and effective design of ISP Ping Simple taskbar icon WebPing can automatically download pinging results and display the response time ISP Ping Scripts TaskPinger was a cool script from ThreeDotCompany. If you remember, they used to be the makers of Zimbra (or something like that). I heard (and used) TaskPinger a lot for some of my Zimbra related issues with a client. The authors of TaskPinger abandoned Zimbra a while back, but they have a good script named ISP Ping that you might be interested in. It's a simple shell script that can monitor your network's pings from the command line. It provides great information about your local network performance, a list of computer names, and their IP address. It's nice for getting a general idea of how your network is performing by monitoring your pings. I've been using it for years now and you should too. It's a simple and effective utility that you can use to monitor ping time. You can specify the hosts you want to ping, and you can capture the results in a text file, or display the results on the screen. It automatically updates the ping status so you can just sit back and watch as the status updates, provide better understanding of your network performance, increase efficiency, and lower cost. You just point at a file or directory and it listens for incoming pings. It just reads in the results as they come in to a text file. If you pipe it, it pipes them to the console. Internet speed test Speedtest is a free utility created by Windscribe.com for testing and comparing the speed of your internet connection.
