Muscle dysfunction in patients with bulimia nervosa: a pilot study. To elucidate the mechanisms of bulimia nervosa, patients (n = 11) were evaluated with a battery of tests of muscle function and neuromuscular junction pathology, including the measurement of isometric and dynamic strength, surface and needle electromyographic (EMG) activity, and both single- and repetitive-tendon unit (STU) and muscle fiber (MF) excursion. These patients were compared with age- and sex-matched control subjects. Although strength was normal on all tests of muscle function, patients with bulimia nervosa had significantly lower mean values of STU and MF excursion compared with control subjects. Two distinct abnormal neuromuscular junction structures were identified by both EMG and histological criteria. First, there was a lower range of STU and MF excursion among bulimic patients, which may explain their lower mean values of STU and MF excursion. Second, bulimic patients had more "unstable" myonecrosis, which was further evidenced by an increased number of myonecrotic STUs. The presence of abnormal neuromuscular junction characteristics in bulimia nervosa indicates that the disordered control of eating behavior might be a consequence of dysautonomia rather than an organotropism with a specific
