New Create-a-Character mode will open up to you. You can freely increase your character's stats for the muscles, constitution, magic, and mental stats, and change their looks. In this mode, you'll also meet nobles and dragons, giving you the chance to select a character that you'll be able to view in battle. If you fail a battle, your character will be increased in level, and your stats will be increased. You can also earn characters from the nobles and dragons you've faced. Next is the RPG battle system. You can switch to any background enemy or NPC you face in the world, and use your class to feel the presence of the party in battle. All abilities from the hero, weapons, items, and party members will be bound together with the character's stats. If the hero's skill stats are high, it'll become easier for you to level them up. You can use the items you find in dungeons and treasure chests to upgrade the hero's stats. You can select the items you use and investigate their effects during battle using the menu screen. While battling, the party's stats will be governed by the hero's stats. If the party's stats are high, all enemies will receive penalties to their attack and defense. You can also gain skill experience points by completing quests. Collecting such experience points will allow you to increase your level and unlock new skills. There are also PVP battles. You can sign up for PVP battles and fight against other players while watching live events with other players. I think it's much more coherent and cool-looking than that other stupid Dark Souls 3 trailer. The constant focus on the 'ghosts' of the previous games is also a good idea, since it's a thing that makes sense in the original game.
