The latest 4.2.0 release of Affinity Photo supports PNG8 and PNG24 compression. The actual information and artifacts are almost identical across the two formats, which means that the background composition transition image and colorspace settings can be used to control how the two images are displayed. The possible answers to the background questions are Named, Stripe, Sketch, Image and Color. If the question is answered with Stripe, for example, the background image is displayed using a horizontal stripe pattern. If the colorspace setting is changed to Named, the background image is displayed using colors that match the appearance of the subject in the foreground image. For more information, see the on-demand webinar hosted by Affinity Photo. Some other plugins, such as Lineage Image and Clone Stamp, also trigger the `open_library` prompt if they detect a `.0x` or `0x` format when accessing their library URLs. We recommend that you remove the timestamps from those URLs, since they may prevent some plugins from working. Please refer to the Webhook API and Webhook Error article if you are interested in learning how to extract more information using the `get_event` method in the push operation. If the `response.get_event()` returns a JSON string containing `additional_metadata`, then you can extract additional metadata using the APIs mentioned in the previous section. This metadata is represented as a JSON object within the `additional_metadata` property.

Today, AMD is providing updates regarding our recommended mitigations for Google Project Zero (GPZ) Variant 2 (Spectre) for Microsoft Windows users. These mitigations require a combination of processor microcode updates from our OEM and motherboard partners, as well as running the current and fully up-to-date version of Windows. For Linux users, AMD recommended mitigations for GPZ Variant 2 were made available to our Linux partners and have been released to distribution earlier this year. For many European institutions, Plaid supports the ability for an end user to authenticate via their bank's mobile app even if the user's journey begins in a desktop-based web session in order to optimize for conversion. After the user selects an institution, they will be presented with the choice to scan a QR code and authenticate in the banks mobile app or to continue on desktop. When the user scans the QR code, they will be redirected to the banks app (or website, if the user does not have the app installed). After the user completes the OAuth flow, they will be redirected to a Plaid-owned page instructing them to return to their desktop to complete the flow. If you would like to learn more about Google Project Zero (GPZ) Variants, please check out our microcode update information page . Additionally, we've published an updated list of security issues for credit card processing networks , in case you're looking for additional guidance regarding which microcode updates are needed for which environments.
