Systools Export Notes 7.6 Build 1218 With Crack devices or clients are entities that are used to interact with a resource. a server is a device that accepts requests from devices on the network, executes a particular service, and provides the results to the requesting device. a service is a program that can be invoked by users or other programs to perform a function. a service is not itself a device. for example, windows explorer is a service. if you start the explorer process, you start a service. windows explorer displays data on the desktop, so it is a device. a windows explorer request for data is sent to windows explorer, so windows explorer is a client. windows explorer's response to the request is formatted and passed to the user, so windows explorer is a server. when a process terminates, it goes into a state of readiness, called the "terminated" state, or more commonly, "zombie" state. when the process is "terminated" or "zombified," all its remaining memory is released, or "freed," and the resources are freed up for reuse. to use this functionality on solaris, nis and gss-api should be configured to not require a password for the secure socket layer. this is done in the nsswitch.conf file. for example, on a solaris system: the parameter net.ifq.keep_cnt is not honored when the ilink interface has any of the following filters on it: - ip_src_list - - ip_dst_list - - ip_to_net - - ip_to_net6 - - ip_dst_network - - ip_dst_network6 this behavior is new in freebsd 9.0-stable. in 8.x the default for this parameter was one. 5ec8ef588b
