Principles of Deformity Correction by Paley Dror.Forum Summary In this article, Danilo Milojevic summarizes the first results of the Open Build Service project at the University of Ottawa. The University of Ottawa and the NHGIS are a leading example of a large institution undertaking the upgrade of its institutional build infrastructure. This year, this research institution will launch the Open Build Service (OBS) to ensure its software dependencies are centrally managed and simultaneously provide a mechanism for its academic community to take ownership of building those dependencies. Open Build Service OBS promises a better landscape for developers by providing both a home and a means to manage a project they choose. The community of academic groups who rely on technology created by other developers can benefit from having the source to their dependencies and have the confidence that they can direct and influence their evolution. We see the University of Ottawa as a leading example of how this approach can work. How Open Build Service Is Designed The University of Ottawa's existing software dependency management system does not provide this capability, leaving the academic community to manage their own software demands by managing locally on their own machines, and purchasing from vendors through a 'café' system. With OBS, the University of Ottawa can now manage all of its software centrally, giving it a unified place to get its source dependencies from, and a repository to see what's in the Ubuntu archives, or what else is in development at other organizations. The OBS project will also allow some community feedback into which software is needed where, what is the best way to get that software, and what licensing terms apply. What Open Build Service OBS Does OBS is an Apache 2.0-licensed project, managed by the University of Ottawa. Its goal is to provide a tool that will: Provide the academic
