Miles Miles Davis Sticking Up - Cannonball Adderley - The Coltrane Style of is the highest paid jazz artist of the..Like a true C-student, Prime Minister Stephen Harper likes to "lecture" Canadians on Canada's "values" and run around in circles all over the place about the types of countries the Canadian government wants to be involved in. He's been notably less specific on national defence and law and order, preferring to see Afghanistan-style security operations in other regions than to actually direct the military to address the threats here at home. Still, his efforts in this area have been commendable. By way of a new defence policy, the Harper government has finally provided the first tangible details on its proposed anti-crime legislation, and the Liberals will no doubt proclaim the Harper government's agenda as "tough on crime." We've been led to believe that this is the real Liberal agenda too, if such a thing is possible. However, not only did Harper seem to dodge a bullet on his government's changes to our criminal code (the Liberals have officially supported the crime-fighting initiative, even if they don't have a realistic chance of convincing the public of their sincerity in this), but he also might well be making a much more insidious move: the subversion of our system of justice. Ever since Chrétien's government killed the national inquiry into murdered and missing women (along with the cops' posse of civic, human and Indigenous rights groups), we've been told that the Liberal agenda is anti-crime. However, in all fairness to Libs, they had, on the inside track (or something) of the Harper system. At least their efforts were way ahead of what they put out as part of their supposed crime-fighting agenda. My own feelings are that we've had it with the Liberal agenda, and the public is decidedly against the Liberals' continued efforts to push for a criminal justice system more in line with the priorities of our former colonial masters. If the Conservatives have been anxious to appease the Liberal party, the Liberals have, in
